CAPTAIN WHIDBEY INN

WHIDBEY ISLAND,
WASHINGTON

With its tranquil maritime charm, Whidbey Island, a two-hour car and ferry ride from Seattle, has always felt like a local's secret. But the restored 113-year-old Captain Whidbey Inn just might change that. The main lodge was built from madrona and fir logs and has a large stone fireplace; the 12 upstairs rooms recently got a gentle refresh. The real draw, though, is a group of four new stand-alone cabins—each designed by a different creative business from the Pacific Northwest. Edit, a modern home store in the town of Langley, curated its airy cabin with art by David Price. From $225. captainwhidbey.com

LODGE AT BLUE SKY

UTAH

For all the beauty of Utah's Wasatch Mountain Range, most of the area's hotels are located in Park City for easy access to the ski slopes. But the remote setting of the Lodge at Blue Sky—a 25-minute drive from Park City—allows guests to feel truly immersed in the American West. Part of the Auberge Resorts Collection, the lodge features 46 rooms and suites, some with outdoor fireplaces, built from wood and limestone that blend with the landscape. Adventure seekers will love the cross-country skiing, snowshoeing, and horse riding on the property's 3,500 acres, but downtime is taken just as seriously: A 90-minute High West Whiskey Rubdown includes a shot of the local spirit. RIO PALENA LODGE

CHILE'S LAKE DISTRICT

It's a bumpy, 30-minute car ride from the tiny Palena airfield to this fly-fishing and skiing retreat in Chile's Lake District. But the wild beauty of Patagonia's snow-dusted peaks and the crystalline rivers and lakes teeming with brown and rainbow trout make it well worth the trip—even if visitors never pick up a rod. At the seven-room Rio Palena Lodge, owned and run by Eleven Experience, visitors spend their days fishing, hiking, mountain biking, or heli-skiing. At night, they retreat to pine-paneled guest rooms outfitted with indigenous Mapuche textiles. From $2,500. elevenexperience.com
